The Sound and the Feuer-y

Why City Attorney Mike Feuer Is the Bighorn Sheep Of L.A. Politics (It's a Good Thing!)

By Jon Regardie

City Attorney Mike Feuer has a line, or a variation on a line, that he likes to use. Not a line like "What's your sign?" or "Want to come inside and see my law library?" but rather one with a folksy approach.

Feuer's line is an invitation to cut him off him when he is talking. I've seen him use it a couple times and, considering that he estimates he has spoken to seven dozen neighborhood groups since taking office last July, I guess he has uttered it at least seven dozen times in the last seven months. Probably more.

"I want you to interrupt me," he told the Los Angeles Current Affairs Forum last October when he spoke to about 50 attorneys, business and labor leaders, media types and others. Earlier this month, when a group of approximately 10 reporters showed up in his eighth floor digs in City Hall East for a briefing and assessment of his time in office, he started by saying, "Feel free to interrupt me."

It's a good line but a problematic one, in part because Feuer is a speedy speaker who adeptly jumps from subject to subject. Whether he actually wants someone to interrupt him with a question or comment I have no idea, but doing so is about as easy as striding onto the 110 Freeway and trying to slow traffic by waving your hand.

Then there's the discomfort factor. There's a human inclination against interrupting people — it's bad manners, and it's not something you regularly do unless you're a radio host or a politician. Plus, Feuer's the city attorney, the guy in charge of throwing bad dudes in jail, and interrupting him, you think, holds a 1.4% chance of landing you in the pokie.

For all the problems, interrupting Feuer is probably easier than interrupting his predecessor, Carmen Trutanich. If Feuer's public addresses are the equivalent of traffic on the 110, then Trutanich's speechmaking was like a line of cars speeding toward the finish line at the Indianapolis 500.

This isn't meant as a potshot at Trutanich, whom Feuer defeated in the former's re-election bid last May. Rather, it's a reflection on the past and the present. That's because so much of what Feuer is doing, both practically and stylistically, has to be considered in comparison to Trutanich.

Repairing Relationships

Feuer doesn't often mention his predecessor by name, but as he discusses his time in office, it's clear that he's trying to change just about everything from the previous era. Nowhere is this more apparent than his relationships with other elected officials. By the end of his tenure, Trutanich was warring with both the City Council and then-Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, to the point that the other branches of government filled his budget and took steps to farm out legal work and break up the duties of the city attorney. They even stopped inviting Nuch to the Friday afternoon City Hall Cupcake Parties (OK, those don't really exist, but they should).

City Attorney Mike Feuer adeptly jumps from subject to subject, and always manages to sound both friendly and scholarly. When he speaks at a public event, he may invite you to interrupt him. Good luck making that happen.

Feuer has found common ground with Mayor Eric Garcetti and City Controller Ron Galperin in combatting LADWP union chief Brian D'Arcy, and while everyone's doing that these days, the city attorney has also bolstered his office's relationship with the council. This has prompted another Feuer line, and again, it has nothing to do with seeing his law library: "It is a new day among civic leaders in Los Angeles," he pronounced at the Current Affairs Forum event. A few months later he told the reporters, "I think you will find that it's a whole new day." At the same event, when discussing an appearance with LAPD Chief Charlie Beck, he referenced, bingo, the "need for a new day."

Although it's a cliché, the new-day thing appears to be more than spin. The improved political relationships have alleviated the threat of having his office's budget further chainsawed, and Feuer recently announced that he is doubling the number of attorneys, from eight to 16, in the Neighborhood Prosecutor program. That could have real-world results, as the popular effort dedicates lawyers to communities where they focus on quality-of-life crimes such as prostitution, vandalism and the type of basketball being played by the Lakers.

Tell Me a Joke

There's another way in which Feuer is different than Trutanich: He jokes. A lot.

I don't mean knock-knock jokes or ones that end with lines like, "and that's when she saw what was really under the judge's robe," but simpler fare. I've heard him use marijuana muffins and his mustache to elicit laughs. Both worked. Not hearty guffaws, but they worked.

This is important because, while politics and power are important in Feuer's world, so are people and their perceptions. Feuer has been an elected official for much of the past two decades, having clocked time on the City Council, in the State Assembly and now as City Attorney. He knows how to campaign, how to work a crowd and when to deploy humor to connect with an audience.
